Is it safe to trek Kalavantin durg in monsoon season?

A trek of moderate to difficult difficulty can be found in Maharashtra at Kalavantin Gad. It is possible to hike there without risk if you do it correctly and keep a level head and plenty of patience. However, because the rocks become slicker to climb on during the monsoon season, it is strongly advised that you refrain from going during this time. There is a significant risk of being injured. This location is responsible for the loss of several lives.

Expect to see thousands of people climbing to the top of Kalavantin Fort during the wetter months of the year. During the wetter months, a visit to the fort should ideally be restricted to the weekdays.

Because the rocks become more slippery when heated by the sun in the afternoon, it is best to begin the hike early in the morning. A second piece of advice: do not attempt to take selfies while climbing from the final patch of this hike. Always bring the appropriate footwear for hiking and avoid leaving any plastic behind.

It is recommended that travellers go to Kalavantin Durg after the end of the monsoon season. Avoid going outside during the heaviest part of the monsoon season because the stairs will become slick, and there is a greater chance of having an accident. Because the Kalavantin Durg Trek is so well-known, many people will be there on the weekends.

Kalavantin Durg trek difficulty level

The Kalavantin Durg trek has a difficulty level that ranges from medium to complex. The rock-cut steps and sharp decline make the trail difficult to negotiate. Even though the hike is not ideal for novice hikers, it is still possible to complete it by taking extra precautions if you are a beginner. The trek is the primary draw for visitors on the Kalavantin Durg excursion. A thrilling experience in the great outdoors awaits you on the trek, and it's not far from Mumbai.
